A new class of project managers emerging

BY Karamjit Singh

It is a sign of the increasingly important role IT plays and its shift in the organisational matrix from cost centre to profit-enabling unit, the CIO chapter of Pikom established a unique Project Leadership Certification (PLC) programme in April 2010. The emphasis is on leadership and communications as IT practitioners today need to be as good in soft skills and EQ (emotional intelligence) as core technical expertise. The domain of the IT department is now cross-functional and the IT geek of yesteryear is being replaced with the tech-savvy, business-aware professional.

No one is more aware of this shift than Pikom, which in May 2009 established a CIO Chapter. Set up to be a stage for sharing experiences and knowledge related to technology and management, the aim is to enable Pikom members to learn from each other and enhance the development of the ICT sector in Malaysia.

The CIO Chapter chairman is Andy Tan. As the CIO of EPE, Tan is not only keenly aware of how technology can both solve and enhance business processes but also the important role management and leadership play in the success of IT professionals. So, it is no surprise when he says the CIO Chapter came about because he and some Pikom members saw a gap in the market, specifically in certifying ICT professionals. "We thought that

Tan: Pikom aims to establish PLC as a respected benchmark with Pikom representing the IT vendors and service providers and the CIO Chapter representing the major users, together, we would be the ideal body to come up with a certification for the industry. We saw the void and are filling it."

Pikom felt there was a need for a specialised certification, for, while the industry has globally accepted standards such as PMI and Prince 2 (an European-based standard), they are very academic and examination-based.

"Our PLC puts participants through a very intensive five-day drill to not only make them knowledgeable about what project management is about but also to empower them with the required leadership skills to build high-performance teams that can achieve the desired results," says Tan. (See table)

conducted and 90 of the 109 participants passing, the programme has received the thumbs up from participants. Among them was Ng Kim Hoe, business solution manager with Malaysian Airline System Bhd. He had expected it to be just another standard PMP training session which covered all the chapters. "But, at the end of the programme, I realised I had just completed a PMP boot camp where we easily spent more than eight hours a day in class," he says. On some days, he reveals, participants even stayed up past midnight.

He finds the programme unique as only 20% focuses on the PMP chapters and theories. The remaining 80% is on practical activities. Industry speakers shared their knowledge with participants on practical case studies, which "not only kept us awake all night after class, but also challenged our knowledge, experiences and ethic when dealing with delicate situations," he adds. Ng cautions however that the PLC is designed to challenge experienced project managers and may not be suitable for those with less experience.

Another participant was Badrul Hisham, manager, Project Management & Solution Marketing Division, Mesiniaga. He characterises the PLC as "sharpening up" participants to become both "book smart and street smart." "There are many project managers. The challenge today is to produce or find a project leader. We at Mesiniaga believe that project management is all about the customer experience and how they experience our service. We like this Pikom initiative and believe it supports the national agenda too," he says. Mesiniaga aims to send all 30 of its project managers to get the PLC certification and become the first systems integrator in Malaysia to be fully certified by Pikom.

Tan is naturally pleased with such feedback as the aim of Pikom is to establish the PLC to become a respected benchmark so that companies can differentiate between different levels of project managers and pick the right person for a project. This is why Pikom has created three levels of PLC graduates — senior PLC, regular PLC and associate PLC.

Two more PLC programmes have been scheduled for this year — from July 4 to 8 and Oct 3 to 7.
